

Dear Federal Communications Commission

I urge the commission not to change current indecency standards, but rather actively enforce the standards in place.

Television programming profoundly affects viewers' mindsets and subsequent actions. Children, especially, emulate on-screen behavior regarding the way they communicate and relate with others. Indecent language, actions, and images negatively impact their behavior and ultimately our society.

Many networks embrace a race to the bottom in order to gain attention and ratings. Changing FCC standards would only accelerate their irresponsible approach to programming. The FCC can do better than to abdicate its important responsibility to us in the viewing public.
